Right eye shows similar changes, commencing in lower temporal veins, beginning at 2--3 optic disc diameters from the optic disc, and extending to the extreme peripheral radicles, with similar changes in the upper temporal vein; the changes referred to were: (a) white cotton-like deposit on the coats of the vessels, (6) some haemorrhages, (c) a black spot amongst the upper temporal radicals. The disease was diagnosed as phlebitis of the terminal radicles, gradually spreading in the direction of the blood current and leading to thrombosis. After some months treatment at Wiesbaden, the patient returned with no perception of light in the left eye. In December 1903, the eye became irritable, and showed signs of iridocyclitis, and the patient felt ill in himself; so that on December 14th...
