If the nineteenth century produced a greater man than either of them, he kept very quiet and passed from earth unknown. And how different was the environment and training of these men--one typical of the culture of England, one of the strength and adaptability of America. The studious, patient truth-seeking scientist discovered a truth that placed learning on a new basis and emancipated religion from superstition and misconception. The self-taught boy, the splitter of rails, the country lawyer, following political truth as courageously as Darwin pursued the facts of science, by force of mind and strength of character became a leader of men, and, providentially, the savior of the nation and the emancipator of a race. The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln is an event of uncommon interest and will bring very prominently before the American people that great personality. As time goes on, Lincoln s figure seems to stand forth more clearly and to grow in magnitude. He stands side by side with Washington--one gave us the nation, the other saved it to us. Two types of character differing widely in almost every respect, but each of sterling worth. There is an aristocracy and there is a democracy, and it is well that our national heroes typify both strains. Washington had more culture. Lincoln more shrewd sense; both stood for honor and courage. Lincoln believed supremely in democracy and trusted in God with a simple steadfast reliance. His...
