DEVELOPMENT OF A SCREENING MODEL FOR DESIGN AND COSTING OF AN INNOVATIVE TAILORED GRANULAR ACTIVATED CARBON TECHNOLOGY TO TREAT PERCHLORATE-CONTAMINATED WATER

This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Perchlorate contamination of drinking water is a problem that has recently gained national attention. The purpose of this research was to develop a tool to predict the cost and performance of tailored granular activated carbon (T-GAC), an innovative technology to treat perchlorate-contaminated water. The ability to predict cost and performance is essential to promote transfer and commercialization of innovative technologies. This study investigated how data obtained from small-scale laboratory tests could be applied to predict cost and performance of a full-scale T-GAC system to treat perchlorate-contaminated water. A technology model was developed using GAC design principles and using a multi-component Freundlich isotherm to describe sorption of perchlorate on T-GAC, in the presence of competing anions. 146 pp. Englisch.
